Doran's Cove Church and Cemetery, Doran's Cove, Jackson County, Alabama
Map not drawn to scale

Doran's Cove is a long, tapering valley created by mountains of the Cumberland Plateau, at the lower end of the Appalachian Mountain chain. The head of the Cove lies in Tennessee, while the main portion belongs to Alabama. It takes its name from Major James Doran, a pioneer settler and Revolutionary War veteran. The hamlet of Orme, Tennessee occupies the valley floor at the head of the Cove. Here, at the turn of the century, was a thriving, well-populated mining community. A handsome frame railroad depot from the Victorian era reminds residents of Orme's heyday. The railroad tracks have long since been removed: newcomers marvel at the history of this place--a train station at the end of a remote, dead end cove where there are no railroad tracks. The tracks once snaked tons of coal down the valley and into the river and rail center at Bridgeport, Alabama. The problem of no place to turn a train around in this small area was solved through an elaborate turn-table, on which the engine was rotated 180 degrees, driven to the opposite end of the train on an adjacent track and, thus, headed in the other direction, hauled coal and passengers back out of the Cove.

The story of Orme is only a small part of Doran's Cove life since it was settled by European immigrants. Ten thousand years ago ancient men, women and children lived and worked in what is now Russell Cave National Monument. The high-ceilinged cave is located on the west side of Doran's Cove, about two miles from Orme, and just opposite the valley from the Doran's Cove Church and Cemetery.

Doran's Cove holds a unique place in history. Here, just across a few hundred yards of open pasture from one another, lie buried the earliest Caucasian settlers of North Alabama and the earliest aboriginal settlers of the Southeastern United States. Archaeological explorations at Russell Cave, beginning in 1953, conducted by the Smithsonian Institution and the National Geographic Society and others, have revealed continuous use of the cave by Indian hunting parties and other more settled Indians over a ten thousand year period.

Captain John Woods, an Indian and a Revolutionary War veteran, was granted 640 acres of land in the Cove by the Bureau of Indian Affairs in 1817. He is the first recorded modern settler of the area, although James Doran of Virginia followed within a few year's time. Captain Woods built a substantial stone house in the valley, beside a small spring. The house, located within sight of both Russell Cave and the Doran's Cove Church and Cemetery, is in use today and is the oldest extant structure in Jackson County, Alabama. Dorothy Marsh, in her book Life at Russell Cave, records that Captain Woods allowed Major Doran to share the house "on condition that the two take their meals at the same table to establish equality." The house now has an attached frame addition. The stone portion does not have windows, but an x-shaped series of portholes were included in one wall for defense purposes. Major Doran continued to live in the John Woods House long after Captain Woods departed Doran's Cove for parts unknown. The Woods-Doran House now stands, along with the Doran's Cove Church and Cemetery, Russell Cave and the Orme Railroad Depot, as one of four historic monuments from different eras, built and used by different kinds of people, which makes this area so very unique.

Gravestones in the Doran's Cove Cemetery are typical of those raised over graves in rural cemeteries throughout this region in the last century. The church building itself appears to have been constructed ca. 1850 and was also used as a school. The origin of professionally cut tombstones in the relatively inaccessible area and in other remote places raises an interesting question which has not been widely dealt with by historians to any extent. The wide-spread use of similar burial epithaths throughout the region suggests that the stones all came from a common source or common few sources. "Budded On Earth To Bloom In Heaven", "Darling, We Miss Thee" and symbols of lambs, willow trees, angels and hands shaking in greeting are spread throughout the three hundred graves located here. As did tinkers, portrait painters, circuit riding ministers and others, stonecutters may well have hauled their wares through the more remote areas from time to time, probably in Spring and Summer, selling to families in which a death had occurred over the year previous. The stonecutter may well have worked at home during the Winter months, carving familiar styles of monuments. He would then add the vital data after the stone was sold to mark a particular grave.

The most common symbol in the Doran's Cove Cemetery is the "pointing finger" motif depicting a masculine hand, fingers clasped, except the skyward extended index finger. The designs on different stones variously show both the palm and back of the hands. This symbol is always located in the top center portion of the stone and is done in bas-relief. The meaning of the pointing finger, is obviously, that the deceased has gone "up" to heaven and beckons others to follow. This is a sort of last evangelistic effort, too, as well as a visible comfort to they who mourn the individual's death.

The pointing finger appears five times in the Doran's Cove Cemetery, on the gravestones of people who died over a forty-two year period from 1886 to 1928. However, four of the five deaths occurred during the much briefer seven year period between 1886 and 1893. Examination of other graveyards of comparable age, locale and community socio-economic status in the North Jackson County area show similar patterns of common epitaphs, styles and symbols from the same period of approximately 1880 to 1920. Too, non-native stone used for tombstones in the Doran's Cove Cemetery and other local burial grounds point to an outside source for the markers. All this seems to support the "itinerate stonecutter" theory.

The orderly rows of stones in this peaceful, gently rolling cemetery are disturbed only by the white frame edifice of the Doran's Cove Church, situated on the north perimeter of the graveyard. Built as a church, schoolhouse and meeting place for the community's use, its congregation never adhered to one particular denominational preference, but allowed any minister of the Gospel who wanted to preach there to do so. A pulpit and a high-backed piano occupy the raised platform at the front of the room. A pot-bellied stove stands nearby. Three sets of old fashioned school desks are stacked in one corner. Each set seated six pupils. Among the childish graffiti cut and scratched into the tops of the desks are the numbers 77 and 88, presumably abbreviations for the dates 1877 and 1888.

The building is made from wide boards, nailed on vertically and covered within the last few years by asphalt shingles. The building is approximately twenty by forty feet wide and long. Eight steps lead to double wood and glass doors. The floor and the ceiling are made from "tounge and groove" lumber, supported underneath the floor by log joists. These logs rest on sandstone pillars stacked together without the use of motar. The building has been underpinned in recent years with concrete blocks. Two rough-hewn log posts support the roof, rising from the aisle of the church. They appear to have been planed with a broadaxe. Two similar supports are located at the mid-point of each side wall. The building has eight windows evenly spaced along the walls and one side door.

The roof is tin-covered. A crumbling brick chimney is located on the south wall of the church. The asphalt shingles are nailed on with round headed nails, but the ones in the wall boards are square headed and match descriptions of those which were used in the South from ca. 1830 to ca. 1930. The building is wired for electricity, but is not connected to the power source as of this writing.

The evidence points to a construction date somewhere around the mid-1800's for the Doran's Cove Church. An actual date is not known. As already noted, the first settlers of Doran's Cove arrived ca. 1820, building houses, barns, cribs, outhouses and other structures needed for pioneer life. It seems reasonable that the construction of a place of worship would soon follow, especially if families of the earliest settlers came with them or followed close behind. The earliest dated gravestone in this cemetery is October 28, 1840. The question now arises, which came first the church or the cemetery? I suggest that the cemetery grew up around the church rather than vice versa as the more logical theory.

The structure now situated within the confines of the Doran's Cove Cemetery may not, however, be the first church built there. Oral history sources certainly identify it as the building named in a deed of property made by J. H. J. Williams and Susan A. Williams to James Russell, John Hawk, John A. Jenkins and William D. McCampbell, trustees of the cemetery, on October 15, 1872:

"...In consideration of the Love and affection they have for the cause of Christ, /they have/ bequeathed, given and granted unto James Russell, John Hawk, John A. Jenkins and W. D. McCampbell, trustees for said cause, and also their successors in said cause, all their rights, title and interest that we have in and to one and 4/5 acres of land ...in Doran's Cove...including the Church house and grave yard....to have and to hold as a location for a church, School house and burying place as long as it may be used that way. In testimony whereof we have herewith set our hands and seals.

This transaction is recorded in Deed Book No. 6, pages 481 and 482 in the Jackson County Alabama courthouse. Of the people named in this deed, only James Russell's name appears among those in the cemetery.

Major James Doran
Who Departed This Life
October 28, 1840
In the Seventy-Sixth year of his age.

1840
76

1764

He has left an affectionate wife and a numerous circle of friends to mourn his death. His whole life was one continued scene of philanthropic benevolence. In his death, the poor have lost a real friend and society a useful member.

He is gone.

But his friends should not sorrow as those that have no hope for he left this world in the triumphs of a living faith and to the hope of a happy immortality.
He taught us how to live, and, Oh too high the price of knowledge, taught us how to die.

The numbers following names in this listing represent numbers of individual graves and the section of the Doran's Cove Cemetery in which each is located. The two digit number before the decimal point is the grave number and the single digit number following the decimal point is the cemetery section. Please refer to the maps for approximate locations of graves and sections.

Jerry Hawkins, for instance, is assigned grave number 73.1. That means his is the 73rd grave (not tombstone, but grave) in section number one.

Doran P. Russell, a direct descendant of Major James Doran and of Thomas Russell, president of the Doran's Cove Cemetery Association, assisted greatly in the preparation of this paper, as did Olivia B. Brewer, director of the Jackson County Council on Tourism, and Lee A. Langston, director of the Scottsboro/Jackson Heritage Center.

John H. Graham is a senior history major at Berea College, Berea, Kentucky. He is also on the staff of the Stevenson Railroad Depot Museum, Stevenson, Alabama and a member of the Association for Gravestone Studies.

The Alabama Historical Commission, in response to this essay, named the Doran's Cove Church and Cemetery to the Alabama Register of Landmarks and Heritage on 16 April 1985. The site was formally dedicated as a Register listing during ceremonies on 8 June 1985.

DORAN'S COVE CHURCH AND CEMETERY
Jackson County, Alabama

Since the publication of this paper in June 1985, the following corrections and additions have been brought to my attention. I sincerely apologize for these errors and ask that you attach this sheet to the end of your copy of the paper. Thanks. John Graham.

Section Two

The following inscriptions were omitted from the paper:

Albert Phillips
14 Jan 1915
16 Jan 1915

Anna Laura Phillips
23 Dec 1923
06 Jan 1924

These graves lie directly in front of graves 30.2 and 31.2. Also buried nearby, but without markers, are infant babies of Joe and Nell Phillips.
